Not illustrated. 1687 Excerpt: . . . them; and yet in all that speech, the man fays nothing but what is old, and dull, and flat insipid stuff; all and every thing in it has been answerd five hundred times, since the Reformation, and at least twenty within these two years. This looks like perverse stupidity, for men to pretend to be writers, when they do not reade; if our Authour had read the late Books, by this writing he gives plain proof, that his Reason serves as little in drawing up Pleas for Authority, as it did before in making Schemes of Christian Doctrine out of the Scriptures. All that he fays, is this, that he heartily wished that God would have pleased to have left us some unerring Authority and Sovereign Guide, p. 6. and then, that God has not left the World without Government, and given us Laws without lawfull Judges and Interpreters, . 10. From thence he presumes that there is such a thing, and resolves to go in quest after it; he comes to the Church of England, and demands it there; they deny that they have any such Authority. Not content with that, he puts himself to the trouble to prove it, p. 11. he goes to the Chu ch of Rome; they fay, they have it, p. 12. and he presently believes them; and after a sew rubs removed out of his way, he reviews Bellarmines marks and signs of a true Catholick Church, and...
