The authors conclusions are: It is the duty of an attorney to defend one charged with crime, though he be convinced that the prisoner is guilty; but in conducting such a defense the lawyer should not go any further than to see that the party is convicted in strict accordance with the rules of law, and by a fair and impartial trial. The book is designed as a text-book for law school classes and is well adapted to its purpose. At the same time the busy, practical lawyer will read many of its pages with profit.
