Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: .the regular reader named, shall be used in each of the four lower grades, and for each of the grades above the fourth it names the reader for the grade and adds with supplementary reading. There are at present sixty-two classes in the grammar and primary grades. For the use of these classes there are about one hundred and fifty sets of readers, or an average of about two and one-half sets to a class. These sets vary from those containing one book for each pupil to those containing twenty or less to a set. There are about three thousand pupils, and the entire number of readers in the city is five thousand four hundred and thirteen (5,413) or about one and eighth-tenths per pupil. Perhaps it will be plainer to arrange by grades. Grade IV.--Each pupil has a copy of Monroe s Third Reader. Besides this there are 80 copies of literary reading, 212 copies of geographical reading, 105 copies of animal stories. It will be seen from this that each class has only about three-fifths of the amount of reading called for in the course of study. This is partly obviated by having quite a variety in the different schools and making exchanges. The number of readers to each pupil is not important, for the class is divided into small sections, so that from ten to twenty-five readers in each set is enough in the primary grades. Grades V-IX.--Each pupil in Grade 9 is...
