Not illustrated. 1866 Excerpt: .then he made a careful journey round the room, holding on by chairs and tables, or clinging to some loving hand; until, at last, standing quite erect, alone, he could move slowly on. And all the time his word of hope was this, When the summer comes! 6. Through a long winter, and a cold bleak spring, this hope never failed him. A fairy little carriage was obtained for him, in which, well wrapped up from the cold, a-d resting on soft cushions, he was from time to time drawn out in the garden when the sun shone brightly; but if any one praised his little carriage, and told him what a fine ride he was taking , he would quickly exclaim, Wait till the summer comes--then Frankie will walk again! 6. The summer came, with its glad birds and flowers, and its balmy8 air; and Frankie rode out every day. One day, when taken into the garden, he so longedf to walk, just to the holly bower, that he was allowed to make the effort. And on he did walk; quick at first, then slower, slower. He would not rest in any of the arms stretched out to receive him, though the fitful color on his cheek went and came, and the pauses in his steps grew more and more frequent. At length he reached the bower; but, with a heavy sigh, he said, Tis a very, very long walk now; but Frankie must not...
